In Sunny Italy.

ROME, ITALY, July 28, 1901.

My Dear Friends—The weather in Rome seemed a little warm the first day, but it really isn't hot. The sunshine is very warm but there is a good breeze and I doubt if the thermometer goes above 85 in the shade.

Monday morning in Florence we went to the Baptistery first and compared the three sets of bronze doors. We shall always remember that morning for the way the bells rang just when Prof. Powers wanted to talk to us about the Baptistery and Duomo. They rang without stopping three quarters of an hour and they aren't particularly musical either. We never knew what they rang for. It may have been some saint's day. Florence bells are always ringing at unexplainable times and seasons. After going into the Duomo sacristy to see the little marble angel held by Donatello we went over to San Lorenzo where Michael Angelo's wonderful statues of the Medici are. The large statue of the Madonna and child in the same room appeals to me as few statues ever have. We came back to the cathedral and found a quiet time to look at the Descent from the Cross, that unfinished statue by Michael Angelo. The sorrow in Mary's and Joseph's faces is so terrible, yet so unobtrusive. Before lunch we had time to go into the Cathedral Museum and see those choir stalls one by Donatello and the other by Della Robbia. We had quite a discussion as to which one was better. You remember that Della Robbia's is decorated with reliefs of singing and dancing children, reliefs separated by architectural designs, while Donatello's has a solid band of dancing children in front of which stand some pillars which divide the frieze into sections. They were designed and put in the Cathedral but have been taken over to this museum which has various bits of drawing, sculpture and the like that have been connected with the Cathedral.

That afternoon at three we took a drive first going to the Buonarroti House which is now a Michael Angelo Museum. It has some of his drawings and plans and most of all two early works of his in marble, a relief showing the centaurs fighting and a small Madonna and child in a yellowish marble. It is only about two feet tall and is so dainty in the way the Madonna's head and drapery are worked out. After looking about there awhile we got in the carriages and went out to a church San Soli where there is a fresco of the Last Supper by Andrea del Sarto. It is beautifully colored and the figures are graceful but there isn't any great depth of feeling in it. The last place we visited on our drive was the Protestant Cemetery, a small but beautiful place, with many roses and trees. We saw Mrs. Brownings grave, also Walter Savage Landor's and Theodore Parker's. Almost every stone was marked in English.

On Tuesday there were two thunder showers which helped clear the sultry air. One was in the morning while we were in a church trying to see Masaccio's frescoes, Christ and the Tribute Money. It cleared enough for us partly to see the picture and stopped raining in time for us to get out of the carriages at the Pitti Palace where we spent the morning. We had a lovely time with the pictures. A copyist was making a large picture for a building in Kansas City, the Library I believe. It was that one of Rubens, The Spirit of War.

That afternoon we drove up to San Miniato, a hill opposite Fiesole, the city of Florence and the Arno between. We weren't expecting rain but were about half way up when it began and simply poured for the other half of the ascent. The drivers had large umbrellas to go over the front of the carriages and they put the tops up and then spread an oil cloth over the crack between so that we didn't get much wet. We had only one or two umbrellas in the whole crowd. It stopped about the time we wanted to get out and we stood on the wall in front of the San Miniato church for a long time watching the cloud and mist and finally sun effects on the panorama before us. It was simply beautiful. Mt. Morello that Browning talks about and Fiesole opposite and Florence with her domes and towers and red tile roofs freshly washed. I think the party as a whole liked that visit better than anything we did in Florence. We went in the church of course, and then up a flight of steps in the modern cemetery up on to a rampart which gave us a view more extended, for we could see past the church up into Vallambrosa. The ride down past the villas and drives was beautiful. We stopped to look at Michael Angelo's square, where his fortifications are. I don't know any city that I'd like to spend six months in so well as Florence. We drove through the Via Bardì, Romola's street and after supper Professor Sordani from Browning to us, Andrea del Sarto and Fra Lippo Lippi. The next morning, Wednesday, we visited the Riccardi Palace where Fra Lippo was painting when he grew impatient and escaped by the sheet rope. We went to see a little chapel which is covered with bright gilt and red frescoes by Gozzoli, very decorative. We went also to Santa Maria Novella, a church which has three or four distinct stages of Florentine painting in it, Ghiberti's Madonna which looks stiff enough to us but which was such a departure from the Byzantine rules of painting that the Florentines when they were admitted into his studio and saw it finished carried the picture and artist as well through the street in their enthusiasm and the name of the street has been joyful from that day to this. In another chapel we saw the work of Orcagna, one of Giotto's pupils, a side wall painted with one huge picture to represent Paradise, straight rows of saints one behind the other, no perspective at all, but many wonderfully sweet faces. Then in the choir was some of Ghirlandajo's fine drawing and good perspective. Then the Spanish chapel which really appealed to me this trip in its wonderfully decorative character. We had time Wednesday to go into the Archaeological Museum. The Egyptian collection is very good. In it we saw some wall paintings mummies of children and adults, as well as cats, owls and ibises, but we didn't have time to stay long in a place. In the Etruscan collection we saw beautiful vases in different colors, some brown and black, some exquisite in design, jewelry in gold and silver, needles, thimbles, brass mirrors, many of them dating back to the 5th and 6th centuries B. C.

Thursday morning we went to the Annunziata church to see Andrea del Sarto's frescoes. Of course we looked at the beautiful Medallions in blue and white on the front of the Foundlings Hospital which faces another side of that square. They are beautiful babies in swaddling clothes. We have seen a dozen babies bound up tight in these white strips of cloth in the last few days. Then there was the Academy left, where we saw Michael Angelo's David and some beautiful Florentine painting. It is such a satisfactory collection. Thursday afternoon was devoted to last odds and ends. I went on a long tour by myself, looking at various buildings I'd seen and buying a little fruit for our ride to Rome.

Monday morning. We got up earlier than usual so as to get out by seven, that is a few of us who wanted to see the King and Queen go to the Pantheon to mass at eight. We saw all we could and have half an hour before the morning program begins. When we got to the Pantheon we took our stand where we thought the Royal party would pass and watched the people. In the large square in front of the Pantheon soldiers were stationed forming a large semi-circle which was left clear for the royal guard and carriages to enter. Occasionally a carriage drove into this space to let some military man or honored personage into the building. Tickets were issued to the elect. We could see in the portico heavy drapery in black relieved by gilt crowns and flowers. As the hour approached the crowd increased and other squads of soldiers came to guard the entrances of the streets that open into the Pantheon square. They wanted to keep horses and vehicles out. At ten minutes of eight we heard a clatter of horses and hoofs and saw the mounted guard galloping down the street we were on. A line of soldiers kept the street open for them. There were several carriages but the first one was the King's. Two of these mounted men came first then two more a little behind them but farther apart, then two at each side of the royal carriage and others behind, so that it was fairly surrounded by these fine horsemen in their gold helmets and fine uniforms. They stopped in the semi-circle and got out. I saw several women in black and one man I thought might be the King but I can't be sure. A few minutes later another party came galloping down the street this time it was the Empress Dowager Queen Margherita. I think I saw her as she walked up to the door, a tall woman in heavy mourning. A special mass has been written for the occasion to be sung by five hundred voices and accompanied by sixty instruments. If we get as satisfactory a view of the procession to-night I shall be surprised. It is to be a great demonstration to show the strength of the military. In fact it is a special plan of the royalist party to give the church an idea of their strength. The Vatican has threatened to unchurch the Pantheon if they take the royal flags into the church. It is a matter of some curiosity to see what will happen. The streets through which the procession is to pass are covered with a yellowish sand to keep the horses from slipping I suppose. Everything in town is closed except the Vatican and the churches. We have to change our program and go to some of the latter.
